economic banking and fiscal con-ditions in Germany and the pros-pective continued loss of world trade had greatly alarmed many of the industrial leaders and almost all the bankers of Germany. It seemed as though Germany was strained economically at that time to the breaking point. Therefore the presumption was strong that irresistible pressure would be brought by the economic leaders in Germany upon the military parts which would result in sincere and responsible attempts to secure an early peace. It appears, however, that the military party was too strong at that time and that its feeling of strength was based upon the belief that it would drive its army to the French and Belgian coast and asio to Paris, and in that way secure
